Referring to the subtitle, we try to deal with the multitude of the possible human being interpretations and actions of those who created the past. Still, we wonder whether the truth is accessible, or to what measure it could become as such, because we have two hypothesis: a) evoking the past may seem either improbable, as well as the use of history in order to get history knowledge; b) the past must be accepted even by its specific culture, history meaning in this case, the mere reflection of one's own dominant restlessness.

Exploring the past time and events implies a certain kind of knowledge, mainly relying on a necessary axiological horizon, doubled by comprehension ability and assumed expression. The analysis of the "self-referencial" paradigm may confirm/deny the inflation and/or the neglect of the apart "ego". Applying the "de-construction" concept, frequently contested in an empirical way, by deductive methods, is confirmed by one of the thesis expressed in the past by philosophers, about the inexistence of facts and the uncertainty of interpretations.
